Marine invertebrates are a group of animals that contain two classes of hemichordates, echinoderms and protostomes. There are more than five thousand extant species of echinoderms. A typical echinoderm is formed from a larva that passes through a series of developmental stages including a gastrula, a protochordate, and an echinoderm larva. The echinoderm larva is hinged to the parent body. During this hinging, or metamorphosis, the echinoderm larva grows into a young adult echinoderm. Hemichordates are protostomes. There are roughly five thousand extant species. Hemichordates are typically larval stage of a metamorphosing animal.
