It's probably not recommended to use a 3rd party application for management as it can cause issues with the OS that may not be resolved by the application or the manufacturer. A windows update will always apply first when an application needs an update which could cause unwanted side effects. That said, there are some tools that are available through the Windows store that are free and can be used for managing file systems. With this article I found a small list of such applications, though I'm sure more have been created since it was written. One last thing to add, when a file system is emptied of files the process takes a considerable amount of time. This is basically a copy process so it may take a while to perform. If this is a frequent process it could cause issues with the OS as a copy process may push the system to 100% or full for extended periods of time. As others have said, this isn't a perfect solution. If the storage drives are not mounted, do you need to unmount them first? Some applications automatically unmount them when they are finished, but if not, you will have to do it yourself. If the storage drive isn't plugged in, will it cause a problem? I've seen several issues where a USB device that wasn't plugged in at all caused other devices to behave badly, for example, double-clicking an empty drive icon in Windows Explorer would attempt to remove the volume or would cause a lockup. If you ever want to use this drive on a different machine or plug it into a different port, you'll need to go through the process again. But, I think for the price, it's a very nice solution.
