Q: Should the reference/origin of copied code be public? I'm curious, if a developer decided to steal code from a source, should he or she be responsible for documenting and distributing the code with its originator, or should the author of the stolen code be more responsible for upholding the originator's work? If the concept is trivial, I can't imagine any need for this discussion. A: The origin of the material may be public, as you state, but whoever copies it should at least acknowledge and make clear that it is being used without any permission. As to attribution, it is very difficult to enforce this. Also, there are plenty of examples of code that was blatantly copied without attribution, which I would consider a copyright infringement. Imagine the following to take an extreme example: John Doe has a website where he shows code he wrote for an audio conversion program. He writes: Here's my converter that does what you want. Later John Doe is asked to do something similar at his job, and does not look at John Doe's site.

John Doe uses that converter on his project, and does not link to the page he took it from. John Doe ends up hired by a company that makes audio converters. Later, another company hears about the audio conversion program, and makes a competing product. They are asked to make their product able to convert a file type that the original product cannot do. If the original site does not state where the converter came from, it could be that the original
